Urine Trouble In Cats And Dogs

Cats and dogs bring so much pleasure to their owners. They help people laugh, relax, even get outside and exercise. Sometimes, however, they can cause their owners to worry if something's wrong. It's not their fault; they can't tell people that their tummy hurts or that they don't feel well. That's why it's important for owners to look for telltale signs when pets just aren't acting like themselves. One sign that pets need to visit the vet is frequent urination. Frequent urination can be caused by urinary tract infections, kidney stones, or diabetes, and it's a symptom that requires attention. Cats might urinate in odd places when ill, and dogs will go beyond their usual territorial tail lifting.

In a healthy animal, the kidneys filter waste products that are produced by the body. In kidney failure, these waste products are not filtered properly and start to build up in the blood stream. We can help to educate you how to watch for signs of kidney failure.
